Interference Goes Both Ways

Don't panic, people. We've all been hearing how BPL causes interference to our service. Well, guess what, IT GOES BOTH WAYS!

Their big network of wires not only operates as a transmitting antenna, but it acts as a receiving antenna. The local radio club (Rochester, MN) got TOGETHER with the local power company to do co-operative testing. They taped signals off the air while the power company switched things on and off. Did it cause interference? Oh, yeah. It even totally blocked WWV. No surprises there.

What was very interesting, and what I had heard nothing about before, was the effect of ham radio on BPL:

A 25 watt 40m signal transmitted 2 blocks away into a mobile vertical caused a complete (100%) blockage of packet flow on the BPL network! A 10 watt 80 signal in a multiband dipole 65' away completely blocked BPL network traffic.

Think about that! A kw into a beam would probably block BPL for miles in whatever direction the beam is pointing.
